13 DRAGONHEART – READING

Dragonheart

The Old Code

For thousands of years kings were kind to peasants and knights helped kings. This was the Old Code. Life was good, and everybody in the country was happy.

Good Sir Bowen and all his kings, princes and knights before him were Knights of the Old Code. Sir Bowen wanted to make Prince Einon a good fighter and wanted to teach him the Old Code.

Main characters

Sir Bowen (a knight of the Old Code)
Prince Einon, later King Einon (son of King Freyne and Queen Aislinn)
King Freyne (a tyrant King)
Queen Aislinn (King Freyne's wife)
The Great Dragon (a helpful dragon)
Kara (a peasant woman)

A New King

But not everyone followed the Old Code. Einon's father, King Freyne was a cruel king. He was killed in a battle with the peasants. Einon saw his father die and when he took the crown from his father he was badly injured by a woman called Kara.

Sir Bowen's face was tired and sad and he stood with Prince Einon, in his arms.

'I'm sorry, Queen Aislinn,' said Bowen, with his head down. 'The prince fell too.'

'Don't be sorry, Sir Bowen,' answered the queen. 'They killed Einon because of his cruel father, the king. Now, put him on my bed.'

But Einon wasn't dead. The crown, the crown...', he said weakly. Bowen put the crown into Einon's hands. But the queen didn't listen to him. She stood next to Bowen and looked down at her son. Then she slowly took off his shirt.

'We can't help him now,' Bowen said sadly.

The queen said nothing. She walked to the window and looked at a beautiful picture of a dragon on the wall. 'Perhaps we can, Bowen,' she answered. 'Perhaps we can...'

The Dragon

It was a cold, dark place and it looked dangerous.

'Follow me. Don't be afraid,' said the queen. She walked in and the men followed her. They couldn't see much. There was a lot of smoke, and there were dead animals on the ground near their feet. Then Bowen heard the strange song again.

Suddenly, the music stopped. From out of the dark somebody asked sadly, 'Are the stars shining tonight?'

'No, there aren't any stars in the sky tonight,' answered the queen.

'Is that Queen Aislinn, wife of King Freyne?' said the dragon.

'Yes, Great Dragon. The people in my country love you and the other dragons. We're your friends.'

'No, Madam,' answered the dragon. 'Men and dragons were friends for thousands of years. But things are different now.'

The dragon came slowly out of the dark and sat on the ground near the queen.

'Bring Einon here, Bowen,' said the queen.

The knight carried Einon in his arms and put him down on the ground. The dragon's face was high above him. It was very ugly – brown and black, with a large mouth, big teeth, and sad eyes. Bowen felt very afraid – he never took his eyes away from that face!

The dragon looked down at Einon. 'It's King Freyne's son!' he said. 'I hated the king. He loved killing dragons and peasants. What do you want from me, Queen Aislinn?'

'I want your help,' answered the queen. 'A peasant hurt my child in the battle. Einon's not the same as his father, Great Dragon. This knight, Sir Bowen, is teaching him the Old Code. And I'm going to teach him about dragons in the future. Please help him.'

'You're asking a lot, Madam. Your son's very ill,' said the dragon.

'I know,' cried the queen. 'But he's king now. He'll be a good king. Sir Bowen and I will help him. He won't be cruel, Great Dragon.'

'He has to say that, not you,' answered the dragon. Then he looked at Bowen. 'Give me your sword, Knight.'

Bowen pulled out his sword and gave it to the dragon. The dragon stood over Einon, with the sword in his hands. The boy opened his eyes. He saw the dragon, and tried to move away.

'Don't be afraid, son,' said the queen quietly. 'The Great Dragon's going to help you.'

'I will help you, boy. But first you have to say these words: "I won't be a cruel king. I won't kill dragons and peasants. I'll love my people and be kind to them. I'll always live by the Old Code." Now, are you ready? Repeat them after me!'

Einon was very tired, but he repeated the dragon's words. Then he fell back into Bowen's arms.

'Einon, Einon!' shouted Bowen. 'No, no! He's dead!' Bowen was very angry and tried to pull his sword away from the dragon.

But the dragon shouted, 'Knight of the Old Code. Stop! Watch me! Now!' Then he pushed Bowen's sword into his heart! A red light came out of the dragon. He caught the light in his hands and turned to Einon. 'This light's half my heart, boy. I'm giving it to you. It'll make you strong. Enjoy a long life and always remember the words of the Old Code.'

Einon's eyes slowly opened. He felt weak, but he wasn't dead. Bowen looked at the boy, then he looked up at the dragon. 'I'm sorry, Great Dragon. I was angry and afraid. Thank you.'

'You can help Einon now, Sir Bowen. Teach him the Old Code well. Never forget my words.'

Jaco the Leek

Part 1

A Wish at Bedtime

This is me, Cai.

And this is my older brother, Jaco. His real name is Jac Owain Evans, but everyone calls him Jaco. Even the teachers sometimes, though never when they're telling him off.

This is a leek.

And this is Saint David. He's not in the story.

He's dead. He died a very long time ago. But he is special to the people of Wales. So special, he has his very own day, Saint David's Day. It's on the same date every year, the first of March, and everyone uses it to celebrate being Welsh. Some people wear daffodils pinned to their jackets. Some people wear leeks. They must be mad! Leeks are stinky old things.

There are concerts and parties all over Wales. In our school everyone dresses up in Welsh costume.

That's what usually goes on. But last year was different. Last year, my brother wanted to do something extra-special for Saint David's Day. He decided to be a leek. He didn't want to dress up as a leek. No. That wasn't enough for Jaco. He wanted to BE a leek. So he made a wish and it came true. And this is how it happened.

The story begins the night before Saint David's Day. Jaco and I are lying in our beds, side by side like a pair of slippers. Listening to the rain falling tip-a-tip-a on the roof when Jaco says: 'Do you believe in the Tooth Fairy?'

'No,' I say. 'She's not real.'

'I'm not so sure,' says Jaco. 'I hope she is real, because I want her to grant me a wish tonight.'

He gets out of bed, goes to the wardrobe and pulls out his special box. I hear him feeling for something in the dark. Then he puts the box back and climbs into bed again.

'I've been saving my last tooth,' he says, 'but I think the time has come to use it.'

'OK,' I say, playing along. 'What are you going to wish for?'

'Something special for Saint David's Day. I'm tired of dressing up.'

I know how he feels. I haven't made a costume this year. I'm just going to wear my rugby shirt. But Jaco usually makes a big effort. He loves to be the best.

'This year,' he says, 'I want to be a leek.'

'You can't start making a costume now. It's gone ten o'clock.'

'No, I don't want a costume. I want to be a leek!' There's real excitement in his voice. 'I'm putting the tooth under my pillow, see? Now I'll make the wish.' He takes a deep breath. 'Tooth Fairy. If you are listening ... please turn me into a leek for Saint David's Day.'

Nothing happens.

I hear Jaco sigh. I'm disappointed too. I wanted a flash of lightning or something. I turn over in bed. 'Sleep tight,' I say. 'Sorry your wish didn't come true.'

But I'm wrong to say that, because the wish does come true! There must be a Tooth Fairy and she must be listening. Because the very next morning, Saint David's Day, the tooth has gone and my brother Jaco is a leek.
